The Oldest Flight Attendant in the World

Bette Nash is a flight attendant for American Airlines. In 1952, aged 16, she first travelled by plane as a passenger and in 1957, she started her lifelong career. Over 60 years later, at 83, she is the oldest flight attendant ever. When Bette finished school she was keen to meet people and travel. 'This job was ideal,' she says. 'It still is.'

During her career, Bette has flown all over the world but now she only flies the short route from Washington to Boston. This is a distance of 642 km. Her favourite route used to be Washington to London. She has seen many changes over the years. Planes carry many more passengers so there is more work, and modern airports are huge and almost unrecognisable. For Bette, though, the increase in technology is what she's found hardest. When she started, there were no computers and bookings were handwritten on paper. Once, she lost the passenger list. 'I remember asking for everyone's names and hurriedly writing them in my notebook. I gave it to passport control and everything was fine.'

Today, flight training takes six weeks and includes learning about planes and safety equipment. Bette's first training took three days and she learnt only how to make tea and coffee, and dress smartly. Since then, she has been on many training courses to update her skills, including first aid.

Bette isn't planning to stop working. Her short route allows her to visit her son and she still loves her job. She has made many friends with staff and passengers. 'It's not the money …I couldn't leave them. They're like family to me too.'

For questions 1–3, please answer in complete sentences. (2 marks each)

1. When did Bette start working as a flight attendant?

2. Why did she want to become a flight attendant?

3. How long did Bette's training take when she started in the 1950s?
