The Loch Ness Monster

Monsters first appeared in stories over 2,500 years ago. 'Nessie' is the famous monster from Loch Ness, a lake in Scotland. The first written story about this monster dates back 1,500 years, when Saint Columba said that he saw a strange creature attack a man who was swimming in the lake. The story was written down but the monster did not become famous until more modern times.

Many people have said that they have seen Nessie. The first big news story was in 1930. Three men on a boat trip said that they saw a monster. In 1933, George Spicer and his wife saw a strange animal cross the road in front of their car. It then went into the lake and swam away. In the same year, an excited man took the first photo of the monster. He saw the monster's tail and large body splashing in the water. In 1934, Arthur Grant saw Nessie just after midnight when he was riding his motorbike. In 1935, a doctor took a photo, which shows a long neck and a small head sticking up out of the water. This became the best known photo of Nessie.

There are many photos but none are clear. In 1987, scientists used sound equipment to search for Nessie. On the first day, they detected a large object, suggesting an animal larger than a shark but not as big as a whale. On the second and third day they found nothing. Experts believe it was a seal swimming along the River Ness to the loch. To this day, nobody knows if the monster really exists but it continues to be a great story.

For questions 1–3, please answer in complete sentences. (2 marks each)

1. What did Nessie do in the first monster story?

2. What parts of the monster can be seen in the doctor's photo?

3. How did people try to find Nessie in 1987?
