Bungee Jumping

Bungee jumping is the sport of jumping from a high place with long elastic ropes around your ankles. The idea for bungee jumping comes from the island of Vanuatu in the Pacific. People there jump from a wooden structure with tree vines around their feet. They call it 'land diving' and have been doing it this way for hundreds of years. They believed it made them stronger and healthier, although it was extremely dangerous and sometimes ended in death.

David Kirke read about Vanuatu in 1977 and had the idea of modern bungee jumping. He decided to try it with friends from The Dangerous Sports Club in Oxford. He remembers it was very unsafe, because they did not test the ropes before they jumped. David and three friends chose a bridge in Bristol, and from this, they made the first bungee jump.

On that morning in 1979, David organised television cameras to film the event. He covered his face with a scarf. He did not want his mother to see him, because she knew nothing about the jump. He knew she would be scared and probably furious. The jump was a success, but they did not have permission, so they were arrested by police.

The friends made their next jump in 1980 from San Francisco's Golden Gate Bridge, which was higher than their first jump. West Virginia used to have the world's highest bungee-jump site. However, a higher jump than this was made in Colorado at the Royal Gorge Bridge, which still holds the world record. Switzerland's Verzasca Dam is still one of the most popular bungee places as the jump can be done in the dark!

For questions 1-3, please answer in complete sentences. (2 marks each)

1. Why did the inhabitants of Vanuatu start 'land diving'?

2. Why was the first ever bungee jump particularly dangerous?

3. Why were David and his friends arrested after their first jump?
