Sally Ride

Sally Ride was born in 1951. She grew up in California, where she studied hard at school. She was a fabulous tennis player and her ambition was to become a professional player, but she changed her mind and went to university. She is best known now as the first American woman who went into space.

In 1977, after she finished her degree in physics and English, she saw an advertisement for astronauts for the North American Space Agency (NASA). She didn't think she'd be chosen as 8,000 people applied. They called around 100 applicants for interview. Sally was one of 25 people that were chosen and she went to Texas to train for eight months. She did activities such as parachute jumping, scuba diving, and swimming in a heavy flight suit. She found this training difficult but not as difficult as learning about the controls of a space shuttle.

Sally began her NASA career on the ground rather than in space. She started by working as a communicator for the ground control team. Sally qualified as an astronaut in 1979 and her first flight was in 1983. This flight was 147 hours long and Sally described it as 'great fun'. Her second flight was even longer: 197 hours. This was also a success. A third flight was planned, but because of an accident it didn't happen.

Sally helped develop the space-shuttle robotic arm known as Canadarm, which was hugely significant in space technology. In addition to being an astronaut, Sally wrote seven books. All of them are about space and are for children aged eight and older. She wanted to encourage them to study science.

For questions 1–3, please answer in complete sentences. (2 marks each)

1. What is Sally Ride most famous for today?

2. How many times did Sally go into space?

3. What kind of books did she write?
