The Purple Frog

There are hundreds of different kinds of frogs in the world. South American countries like Brazil have the highest populations of frog species. One unusual frog, the purple frog, is found in India in the Western Ghats mountains. Its full name is Bhupathy's purple frog, named after the scientist Dr Subramaniam Bhupathy, who lived in a village in the mountains and spent many years studying animals in the Western Ghats.

Frogs come in all different colours and sizes, but the Bhupathy's purple frog is strange because it has a nose like a pig's. Local people say it looks like a turtle and some people call it a pig-frog because of its nose. It sounds like a chicken when it calls to other frogs. The female and male frogs look the same except for their size: the female is much bigger.

Most frogs live in water but the Bhupathy's purple frog spends much of its life underground. It uses its long tongue to catch insects called termites and, unlike other frogs, never eats snails or spiders. Its legs are short and powerful and this helps it move underground to hide. The only time the frog comes out from underground is in the rainy season as the frog's babies, called tadpoles, are born in rivers or lakes.

Local people have been eating purple frogs for hundreds of years, but this animal was only internationally discovered in 2003. In 2004, it was added to the list of animals in danger. The forest where it lives is getting smaller but many local people are working hard to protect the forest and the animals that live there.
