Deep Time Experiment

On Saturday 24th April 2021, a group of 15 people came out of a cave in France after spending 40 days underground. These eight men and seven women were part of a 'Deep Time' experiment to find out about people's sense of time if they don't have clocks and can't see daylight.

There was a lot of space for everyone in the vast cave. As it was always cold, about 10^{0}C, they had to wear warm clothes. If they wanted light, they had to produce electricity themselves by riding a special bicycle.

They could eat and sleep when they wanted and because they didn't have clocks and couldn't communicate with the outside world, they started going to bed later and later. In the end, their days were around 32 hours long instead of 24, and they began and ended at different times for different people. Most people slept 30 times so they thought the experiment lasted 30 days. One man, Johan Francois, ran 10 kilometres in the cave every day to stay fit and warm. His days were almost 40 hours long and he thought the experiment only lasted 23 days.

When the experiment finished, they wanted to go home, but said they would miss the peace of the cave. Without phones, they realised how unimportant this technology was. Instead, they enjoyed chatting and reading. Scientists are currently using the results of the experiment to help people who work underground or on submarines. It could also help experts plan long trips into outer space or to other planets in the years to come.

For questions 1–3, please answer in complete sentences. (2 marks each)

1. What was the purpose of the experiment?

2. How did Johan Francois keep fit in the cave?

3. How could the experiment be useful in the future?
